

"Sometimes people come into your life and you know right away that they were meant to be there."

Through their artistic endeavours, Ehsaas, a gifted guitarist, and Sanaa, an enthusiastic dancer, attempt to bridge the gap that life's circumstances have left between them.

They attend a prestigious school in the northern Indian city of Chandigarh. Reluctantly, they confess their shattered hearts to Raano, the school bus mentor, on a calm, foggy winter afternoon after experiencing rejection in dance auditions and school band.

The three of them create a beautiful friendship that goes beyond age, background, and cultural differences within the confined space of the school bus.

As the narrative develops, we learn about the personal circumstances of the three of them and how their brief bus ride together helps them unwind and take a breath for themselves. Though the bus ride is short, what it brings out from the three of them is phenomenal.

This movie taught me that people are places in our lives at exactly the right time. Meeting someone unexpectedly who becomes so important to you, is such an unbelievable and special thing.

Friendships often begin unexpectedly, but what makes them beautiful is the moments that are shared between individuals, making them grow, and develop in ways that are truly incredible.
